"I should be thinking and inventing something for the advancement of mankind, not lying here like a lazy cave man," Ugh thought as he stretched and rolled over on the grassy slope to expose his front side to the warm rays of the sun.

While Ugh suffered from spring fever, a small rodent at the top of the hill above Ugh, began digging in the soft earth beneath a huge log. The little animal was only trying to make a home for his family, little realizing that he was setting in motion events that would shake the world.

The dirt the rodent was removing was the only wedge that prevented the log from rolling down the hill. One small pebble was giving the animal trouble. He grasped it with both paws and yanked. It came loose and the log began to move. Faster and faster it rolled down the slope. Ugh, unaware of its approach, snoozed on. With the speed of a freight train it crashed into the head of Ugh and rolled on over the rest of his body.

With a lurch Ugh got to his feet. He thought he had been attacked by some wild beast, but he saw the rolling log below him and knew what had happened.

"It's just a log," he thought, and then the speed of the object impressed him. "Snapping alligator teeth! That thing is traveling faster than anything has ever gone before. If only man could go that fast!"

For days the speed of the log haunted Ugh. There had to be some way to make use of such power. At last he knew the answer. With fire and a stone ax, Ugh succeeded after many days to cut off a one-foot section of the log. With great effort he rolled the section to the top of the slope and released it. The round slice of log rolled, bouncing down the slope. Ugh was elated. If anything, his slab had greater speed than the whole log had.

"I've done it! I've done it!" He jumped up and down with delight. The slice of log had performed just as he had planned.

While he watched the log slow down and come to a stop, he had a horrible thought. "What have I done? NOTHING! It went fast but it didn't help man. I'm still up here at the top of the hill."

Dejected, he walked down to the slab of log. There just had to be some way this wonderful thing could be put to use for the good of mankind. He lifted it up and slowly rolled it to the top of the slope. As he pushed it along he noted that the edge of the slab had bugs and grass imbedded in the bark. They were going along with the log. That was it! All he had to do was to ride on it like the bugs. If it went fast he would go fast.

At the top of the slope he excitedly turned the slab around and pointed it downhill. He gave it a sharp shove and with a shout of joy jumped aboard. The slab rolled on, bouncing and jarring its way downhill. Ugh hung on. It wasn't working quite the way he had planned. With each turn of the slab, Ugh's head was slammed into the ground. The repeated bashing was terrible but Ugh didn't let go. He was determined to see the experiment through.

It was an angry, disillusioned inventor that picked himself up after the log slab came to rest. He staggered about regaining his composure and balance. After his head had cleared and things stopped spinning, he picked up the slab of log and threw it as far as he could out into the river.

Disgusted with the whole thing, he headed for his cave and much needed rest. He had only one thing to say as he looked over his shoulder at the vanishing log.

"Ha! Who needs the wheel! It'll never be anything but a kid's toy!"
